FORESTALLED. A Circus Tragedy.

From London Spare Moments.
A heavenly night. From the blue sky moon hung in the eastern horizon, illuminating tops of the buildings of the city that frosty December night. Fleecy white clouds scudded across the vast expanse overhead, now obscuring a bright constellation, anon hurrying on, on, to break in mists upon other shores.

A small crowd of loiterers hung around the stage door of the Varioty theater after the performance. At brief intervals dark figures emerged for the crossent transfer of the wholesale merchants and manufacturers of Kansas City. Liberal cash commission paid on receipt of contracts. The test class of consumers of each county. Address, giving references and experience, Missouri County Directory Co., Nevada, Mo.

figures emerged from the door into the street.

Among the loiterers was a young man, whose clear cut, classic features wore an anxious expression. His dark eyes were peering steadily in the direction of the stage door. He had a hunted look in the clim light from the dirty lamp.

Suddenly there rang out on the night air three sharp reports. A body fell at the door. The small crowd was quickly doubled, trebled.

The manager of the circus troupe was murdered—shot through the heart!

A month later the young man was on his trial for willful murder. It was a case of circumstantial evidence. A revolver, a his trial for willful murder. It was a case of circumstantial evidence. A revolver, a nickelplated revolver, was found in his possession that hight a month before. Three chambers were loaded, three unloaded; but the revolver had not been discharged.

At the rear of the gallery, from the commencement of the trial there peeped out the assious face of a beautiful girl, with golden hair and blue eyes. Her face was a deathly pallor. It was said she fainted away when the revolver was produced in court.

fainted away when the revolver was produced in court.

On the third day a piercing shrick rent the crowded court as the foreman of the jury pronounced the words, "Not guilty." The trial had been stopped. A man had given himself up as the actual murderer.

Two years before—no, it was more than two, for it was in the mellow tints of a lovely autumn—two young lovers were in low conversation at that same stage door before the performance. The crimson rays of the setting sun danced in fantastic shapes about the dingy place.

"From here we leave for Paris," said the orphan girl to her lover.

"You are going away for a long time, darling?"

"No I believe not not for long Cyril.

"No. 1 believe not: not for long. Cyril. You know I shall write to you. I shall tell where I am in every letter."
He squeezed her tiny hand.
"Ah, yes," he faltered. "You will not forget?"

"Ah, yes," he faltered. "You will not forget?"

She shook her head of golden locks. The blue eyes looked silently into his, then their lips met.

That night they parted. "But only for a time," Winnie said to herself. They would mest ere long, and he—he would be able to keep a wife then. She would be his wife, this beautiful child acrobat.

Yes, they wrote to each other. She told him of the great Continental cities. She spoke of the beautiful sunsets, and orange groves, of purple and snow-capped mountains, and the blue skies—so blue; of black, frowning chasms, rushing torrents, and great buildings reaching to a giddy height against the sky. She told him of tine gentlemen who wanted to make love to her in Paris, Berlin, Vienna, St. Petersburg, and all the places the troupe had visited, but she could never love them.

It was after many months he received the following, traced in her round, girlish hand:
Our manager is very cruel. He does not
